Portland, Oregon city officials are setting up to run opposition to the installation of 5G networks around the city. The initiative is supported by Mayor Ted Wheeler and two commissioners, Amanda Fritz, and Chloe Eudaly. The city feels that 5G health risks \(https://prepforthat.com/5g-health-risks/\) are not well enough understood to warrant installations. Additionally, the federal government's issues with telecommunications rules influenced the opposition movement.

KATU News \(https://katu.com/news/local/5g-wireless-technology-comes-with-big-promises-but-the-city-of-portland-has-big-concerns\), reported that the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) decided to impose new restrictions over how cities are allowed to manage transmitters that reside on city property. They also put a $270 limit on franchise fees. Typically, cities charge $3,000 in fees. According to Wheeler, the disparity in fee acquisition could cost his city almost $10 million dollars, a loss he's not willing to accept. In KATU's report, Wheeler calls the new FCC rules, "something of a land grab against local infrastructures, like telephone poles, where these wireless nodes will be connected."

"Wireless companies in the U.S. say they'll have to install about 300,000 new antennas, close to the total number of cell towers built over the past three decades," the city's opposition proposal states. "This substantial increase in cell towers deployed in communities means greater contact with them."

The city's proposal also includes concerns over 5G's relationship to cancer, something many experts claim does not exist.

It states, "radio frequency emissions generated by wireless technologies could contribute to adverse health conditions such as cancer."

A National Toxicology Program (NTP) study showed evidence of 2G and 3G radiowaves causing cancer in rats. The study presents evidence that the two radio frequency may cause cancer in the heart and brain. You can read that study here \(https://ntp.niehs.nih.gov/results/areas/cellphones/index.html\).

Critics claim the researchers over-exposed the rats to the radio frequencies that no human would reasonably encounter. But that isn't stopping Portland's city officials, as well as numerous other towns and cities, from fighting 5G network installation. Parents in San Joaquin County, California accused 5G network towers of causing cancer \(https://prepforthat.com/5g-cell-tower-cancer-san-joaquin-county/\) in local schoolchildren.

Great story. Portland's getting balzy. Keep it up! Hope other cities follow suit.

A better study to compare health effects is the Ramazzini Study from a highly respected institute in Italy. It's a study of exposure, similar to the ones we experience each day. Astoundingly, the results confirmed the NTP study even very low levels of microwave radiation can cause very serious health effects including cancer. Bravo!

Maybe you could send that to the council members in Portland? They need ammo!

Deborah L Strasser Cramps and diarrhea are likely to be among the first health challenges in Chicago. Contacting the city councils would be a great idea. I've written the mayors' offices in both cities to let them know so that they can act quickly.

Let me add, I put the risk as a question rather than as a statement that could be dismissed easily as "an eye on whether or not there is an outbreak of explosive diarrhea or not? I'm asking because the effects could affect our electrolytes." This way they aren't required to defend anything, plus they are more likely to listen - and indeed it will along with every other symptom imaginable related to nerves.

If we don't contact the City Halls, 5G will spread, and the ozone and EMFs combination is likely to happen indirectly.

5G is a health hazard game-changes. It should NOT be deployed anywhere!
